

Young people should join the fire cadets because it's a brilliant opportunity for all ages. It gives you life skills that will last you later on in life and it will look brilliant on your CV.

I've been to many interviews when you are a Senior Cadet and you're looking for jobs and stuff. There's a vocal point, people want to know about the Fire Cadets and it's got me lots of jobs. I'm happy I came.

We go on many fire service trips, it's very fun and enjoyable and at the end we mostly get a reward. We either go to McDonalds or we have a fun day!

It's a good opportunity with the Fire Cadets if you're a young teenager and want to be a firefighter; it'll get you the training and you'll be able to do it earlier. And then if you just want to get something done as a hobby instead of sitting inside playing on your Xbox all day. You can get out and enjoy trips to Nepal, trips to summer camp and everything like that in the summer.

You start off as a basic cadet, you do your training course and you proceed up to the highest which is Chief Fire Cadet, which I'm going to in September. It is a great experience being able to be responsible for say example: your own crew or your own watch. With school I've led classes of 30, teaching PE and I've linked it back to here because of leadership skills from here.

It's one of the most brilliant opportunities I've ever took and one of the most fantastic things I've ever done.
